PAIN MANAGEMENT

HOSPITAL VS. OUTPATIENT

I wanted to do a newsletter highlighting the practical differences in receiving pain Management services from an outpatient clinic like ours as opposed to a hospital setting. While the quality of care in an outpatient setting parallels that of a hospital setting, the financial aspect of selecting an outpatient facility to handle your pain patients can make you a true facility fees, supply fees, and anesthesiology fees as well as physician and fluoroscopy costs. In an outpatient setting, the majority of these fees are simply not billable. As a result, hospital care can often cost three to four hundred percent more than in our facility. If your patient has a copay based on a percentage of services rendered, given top scheduling priority. Often the patient will have their procedure completed and my notes will be on your desk before the hospitals will even have an opening.

For those patients who need long term pain management, they will follow up with me for their full course of treatment. This hero in the eyes of your patient.

Showing the concern and compassion to refer your pain patients for further intervention already elevates your status in their books, and when you show them that you are also doing what you can to make their care affordable, they are doubly grateful. In a hospital setting, pain management procedures are subject to

they can save hundreds for the same quality of care and virtually identical procedure performed here, under my watch and that of our courteous staff.

In addition, our fluoroscopy suite is one hundred percent dedicated to pain management procedures. That means we are not battling with surgeons for scope time, and that your procedure will be will ensure rapport with the patient as well as consistency of care. While the hospitals all have excellent pain physicians, your patients no doubt will appreciate a familiar face each time they have a procedure performed. Like diabetes, you cannot cure chronic pain but you can manage it, ensuring a quality of life for your patients which would escape them without your compassionate care. Leaving the pain management up to me leaves the equally vital primary care issues up to you, while saving you valuable time.

I work hard to earn your trust and that of your patients, and am honored and grateful for your referrals. We offer the highest quality care often at considerable savings to your patients, with quick appointment times and rapid turnaround on notes. Please feel welcome to contact me should you have any questions regarding pain management.
